Major Grant Proposal
Presented to the Colgate Research Council

Project Title:
“Nuts” (an experimental documentary film)

INTRODUCTION

This grant proposal to the Colgate Research Council is to support production of an ambitious feature-length film project called NUTS. NUTS has a total budget of $245,000; this proposal is for $7,500, which would support a key phase in production I am planning for May-June 2014. The intended outcome of this phase is the production of a 20-minute fundraising sample to be completed before August 2014. The expected public premiere date of NUTS is spring 2015.

PROJECT SYNOPSIS

NUTS is an innovative, feature-length documentary film telling the amazing true story of John Romulus Brinkley, who in 1917 discovers that he can cure impotence by transplanting goat testicles. Tens of thousands of men beat a path to his door, and Brinkley’s empire is born.

Using an energetic mix of documentary footage, animated reenactments and a hilariously unreliable narrator, NUTS traces Brinkley’s rise from poverty and obscurity to the heights of celebrity, wealth and influence in Depression-era America. Along the way, he transplants thousands of goat testicles, amasses an enormous fortune, is elected Governor of Kansas, builds the world’s most powerful radio station, invents the infomercial, the sound truck and Border Radio, hosts some epic parties and annoys the heck out of “the establishment” until finally his audacious actions force the federal government to regulate the practices of medicine, advertising and radio. How he does it, and what happens when it all comes crashing down, is the story of NUTS.

Once all the twists and turns of Brinkley’s story are revealed, the movie more than earns its title. Although it’s sure to be the funniest documentary anyone’s seen in a long time, NUTS is more than just a colorful biography or entertaining romp through American history. Using vivid illustrations and colorful animations, NUTS informs as it entertains, for there is much to be learned from this careful study of one of the greatest conmen who ever lived. NUTS is ultimately a cautionary tale about the seductive and dangerous power of the charlatan.

Note: A 3-minute video teaser for NUTS can be viewed at the following URL (enter the password “Milford2013”): https://vimeo.com/70642123

STORY STRUCTURE (“MAKING THEM BELIEVE”)

The structure of NUTS is deceptively simple. On one level, it is a straight historical biography that proceeds chronologically through the major events of Brinkley’s life. I believe it is possible for a casual viewer to watch the entire film, laugh a lot along the way, and say, “Gee, that was funny documentary about a guy who cured impotence using goat balls. Who knew!”

On another level, however, the film is carefully arranged to offer an indictment of the tactics of the conman (or the unscrupulous documentary filmmaker). The tone, the style, the information that is and is not shared, and when it is shared – all are designed to create the greatest possible chance that viewer will side with the colorful, flamboyant Brinkley against the boring, gray men who want to shut him down. Ideally, you will be so thoroughly entertained that this identification happens subconsciously.

This identification with Brinkley as the hero, however, is undermined. At first this is done subtly and gradually, through a few stray pieces of action and narration that don’t quite make sense. Eventually, this undermining is done overtly, in a climactic trial scene that presents key facts about Brinkley’s life and career that were deliberately left out of the documentary along the way.

The facts presented in the trial are such that had you known them earlier, you would have felt very differently about the events unfolding on the screen. The trial scene is crucial: it reveals that the filmmaker hasn’t been playing it as “straight” as it seemed. Thus, NUTS is carefully constructed to illuminate exactly how a charlatan operates: by offering you a colorful story that makes you want to believe, a story with just enough truth to make it seem believable, a story that flatters you by telling you what you want to hear, the conman sets you up for the sell.

STORY ELEMENTS AND STYLE

• ANIMATIONS. Approximately 1/3 of NUTS consists of animated reenactments of key scenes from Brinkley’s life. The animations are hand-drawn on paper and finished digitally. The animation style changes slightly over the course of NUTS, to both reflect the passing of time in the story (from the 1880s to the 1970s) and to subtly change the viewer’s perception of things. For example: 1, The first act is all sepia-toned; color is not introduced until Brinkley heads for Mexico (it’s a “we’re not in Kansas anymore” kind of moment); 2, Brinkley seems a bit shorter, fatter and less imposing during the humiliation of the climactic libel trial; 3, Certain key scenes are revisited (in flashback) and cast in a different light through framing and color, in order to cast doubt on what is true and what is not.
A still from the first animated reenactment, where Brinkley “discovers” his miracle impotence cure.

- PRINT ARCHIVAL. This story element consists of hundreds of photographs, newspaper clippings, books and advertisements I’ve collected in over five years of research. These elements will be filmed in a studio environment and used as b-roll (cutaways) throughout the film.

One example (out of thousands collected) of a print archival element.

- EXPERT INTERVIEWS. Formal interviews with four historians give historical context to the action. The historians are: Pope Brock, author of the definitive Brinkley biography Charlatan; Jim Reardon, a Kansas historian who made Brinkley his life project; Gene Fowler, radio historian and co-author of Border Radio; and Megan Seaholm, a medical historian.
• ARCHIVAL FILMS. A 1921 “science” film demonstrates, in lavish detail, just how the goat gland procedure “works.” This is important evidence early in the film that will be totally contradicted in the trial scene. Also, beautiful color home movies of the Brinkleys show their lavish lifestyle: yachting, flying in their private airplanes, touring the grounds of their enormous mansion.

• THE NARRATOR. The role of the narrator is crucial. The narrator is written and performed as an objective reporter of facts. This veneer occasionally and subtly cracks, as he occasionally pops in a line or two that seems a bit odd. But the action rushes along and you don’t have too much time to think about these little things. Finally, during the climactic libel trial, about two-thirds of the way through the film, you discover that Brinkley once paid someone named Clement Wood to write a “biography” of him called The Life of a Man. The observant viewer will recall that in the opening credits, NUTS is said to have been adapted from this same book. As the lawyer reads from this book, and you recognize all of the lines as direct quotations from the narration of this documentary you have been enjoying for over an hour now, things become quite uncomfortable. What’s the deal with this movie, anyway? Is it just copied word for word from this fake biography that is full of lies? Perhaps you now feel uneasily as if you have had “had,” once by Brinkley and again by the filmmaker. It is in this state of glorious and productive confusion that the trial concludes, and Brinkley comes to a swift and brutal end.

ARTIST’S STATEMENT

It took many years to develop the thematic and dramatic structure of this film. I find straight biographical documentaries boring and really didn’t want to make one. I finally realized that the best way to pay tribute to a man like John R. Brinkley was to mimic what he did so very well, which was to take essentially true things and weave them into a tale that was more seductive and more fantastic than reality: a better “sell.” Brinkley’s storytelling approach was a bit like Dorothy Gale’s: he took a black and white world and put it in color. Accordingly, NUTS takes a potentially normal biographical documentary and makes it... well, nuts.

Whenever I describe this film to people, the first question they almost always ask (with respect to the goat testicle cure) is: “Did it work?” Because I am a truthful person, I have to tell them that no, of course it did not work; it was and is pseudo-scientific nonsense that at best worked as a kind of placebo and at worst caused physical trauma or even death to those unlucky folks whose surgery didn’t go so well. This inevitably disappoints my interlocutor. In this simple exchange lies the essence of this film: people want to believe in miracles. Like all conmen, Brinkley knew this. I want people to understand the seductive and dangerous power of the charlatan’s appeal, just like the old man at John R. Brinkley’s funeral who said, “I knowed he was bilking me, but I liked him anyway.”

NUTS is a documentary by anyone’s definition of the word (I think!). It’s at least as true as most documentaries are. But you must take care to watch the whole thing. It is only by the end of the film that you see that what appeared to be a simple journey through one man’s crazy biography is actually a cautionary tale about why you shouldn’t believe everything you’re told, even (or especially) if you want to believe it. Confirmation bias is a powerful tool used by scammers – and unscrupulous documentary filmmakers.

CURRENT STATUS AND NEEDS

The script is complete and a full-length assembly with temp voiceovers, storyboards and temp music has been created. This represents almost six years of work, including: intensive archival research in New York City, Washington DC, Arkansas, Kansas and Texas; conducting videotaped interviews in Kansas, Texas, Maine and California; writing (first on my own and later with a dedicated writer, Thom Ststylinski); storyboarding (a pre-production process related to animation); commissioning of animations from award-winning animator Drew Christie; and preliminary editing.
The most immediate need I have is to produce a fundraising sample that functions as “proof of concept.” In order to produce this sample, I need to hire a Director of Photography and Grip (the grip handles lighting and studio setup) to film the archival b-roll (cutaways to things like newspapers, old photos, old books, etc.) in a studio environment. I’ve already discussed this project and these specific needs with three different studios, and have selected BULLET POINT FILMS as the best of the field. Not only have they lowered their standard rates significantly to accommodate my (somewhat measly) budget, but their passion and creativity will be a great benefit to the project. BULLET POINT FILMS is based in New York City and the shoot will take 6 days. I am requesting Research Council support to rent their studio and to contract their services for this period. This studio shoot is crucially important because I need this footage to produce a fundraising sample that functions as “proof of concept.” Without this sample, raising the finishing funds will be nearly impossible.

RESEARCH STATEMENT

NUTS is the follow-up to my debut feature film, OUR NIXON. OUR NIXON used the Super-8 home movies of Richard Nixon’s aides to reveal a surprising and intimate side of the Nixon White House. The film won numerous awards and was released internationally in 2013 by CNN Films and Cinedigm. OUR NIXON and NUTS form the first two-thirds of a planned trilogy of feature-length films about history, archives and narratology in documentary film.

Additionally, in terms of scale, NUTS is the most ambitious art project I have ever undertaken. At each stage of production, I am learning cutting-edge video techniques that directly impact what happens in my studio art courses here at Colgate.
TIMELINE

The target public premiere date for NUTS is spring 2015. This is the best season to release a new documentary film, with film festival opportunities including SXSW, Hot Docs, Boston, Full Frame, San Francisco, New Directors/New Films, and Ann Arbor (all of which my previous films have appeared in), as well as other film festivals I have not previously had the opportunity to attend.

January – April 2014:
- Script finalized.
- Archival research complete.
- Complete rough edit.
- 10% of animations are done.
- Storyboards for all additional animations are edited into picture.

May – June 2014:
- Shoot all archival images with BULLET POINT FILMS. This is the stage for which I am requesting Research Council support. It is a crucial point of the project which will define the visual identity of the film, and will allow me to create a well-made and clear 20-minute fundraising sample needed to complete the project on time. I do not currently have funding available for this stage.
- Produce fundraising sample.
- Casting.

July – August 2014:
- 25% of animations done.
- Sound studio recording: all actors’ performances finalized & edited into picture.
- Plan Kickstarter campaign.

September 2014 – November 2014:
- Launch and run Kickstarter campaign to raise finishing funds.
- 50% of animations done.
- Picture editing (fine cut).

December 2014 – February 2015:
- 75% of animations done.
- Original score commissioned and recorded.
- Attach a sales agent and begin securing television/digital pre-sales.
- Festival submissions begin.

March – April 2015:
- Target premiere date.
- Final post-production: 100% of animations done, plus sound design, color, titles, online edit and mastering.

PREVIOUS GRANT SUPPORT

In the fall of 2013, I received a Research Council discretionary grant in the amount of $1500.00 in the category of Non-Student Wages. This funding is currently supporting archival research related to NUTS.
